10 May 2018 - 177 pages. African Romance, History, Islam, European History. Niane, Djibril Tamsir is the author of ten books on Africa, Europe, and the Middle East. These books have been well received and praised by scholars in their respective fields. In his latest work, Niane examines the history of a great African ruler, Sundiata. What is a "novel"? And can it be about real people? When you open the gilded covers of Danielle Steel and John Grisham, the former's novels have you wondering about the writing techniques that make a book about the life of a single father, a pregnant woman, or a would-be con woman seem authentic? What's the secret of long-lasting suspense, the kind that makes you read late into the night until the end? You want to know. And so does the author of these pages. Niane's Theory of Writing About Real People proposes a philosophical basis for the writing of fiction about real people. His answer to the question, "Can fiction about real people be believable?" is a resounding "Yes!" Niane explains why the fact that the characters in your books, like you and your friends, are real people, does not detract from your credibility as an author. He explains why fiction about real people can, and should, be believable. Niane shows you how to create new ideas and perspectives. He demystifies story structure, including the three basic forms of the novel and the basic plot outline. And if you're still struggling to tell a story that is believable, poignant, and gripping, Niane teaches you the art of using dialogue, description, and character to produce the emotion that resonates with your reader.
